

Journalists

"Curious; excited to learn and write; willing to capture every movement of life around us." These are words that journalists use to describe themselves. They work for TV stations, radio stations, newspapers, and news agencies and have the task of searching for news, interviewing, writing articles, photographing, and video recording to convey the events occurring in the country and around the world.

Journalists require dynamism and may need to rush anywhere at any time. They work with and have access to a wide range of people – police, politicians, artists, celebrities, and common people – in every situation, from wars to epidemics to sporting events. To create a genuine and insightful product, journalists must be those who are not afraid to experience the pressures of time, deadlines, and competition nor to face difficulties and dangers, such as floods, diseases, and gunfire. To overcome these obstacles, every journalist must have a passion and enthusiasm for the profession and to their responsibilities to report the news objectively and honestly and to constantly learn and improve.
