

Musical Taste

Music is one of the most idiosyncratic personal tastes. There can be much argument about what type of music is best or which artist or band is better. Even within a single artist's discography, there are arguments among fans about which album is best, often with a watershed recording or period dividing fans into those who think the artist's best work came before and those who think it came after.

There are a myriad of styles of music, with divisions and sub-styles within each, often specifying a style to an absurd degree of granularity. Is it really important whether the Scandinavian speed metal band that you are listening to comes from urban Finland or rural Sweden?

In the end, it doesn't matter. People like what they like, with many people enjoying wildly disparate forms. It is not uncommon to find the same person relaxing to classically-inspired jazz in the morning and dancing to dubstep in the evening. Indeed, the best predictor of what kind of music a person will enjoy is simply age: people often enjoy whatever music was popular in their youth.
