

Teaching

Teaching is not an easy profession. A teacher must be a master of their subject, a psychologist who understands how people learn, a talented presenter, an excellent planner, a sergeant who can keep order in a classroom, and a counsellor who can perceive the thoughts of students and why they might not understand the lesson.

Many students do not realise how much work is required for each lesson. The teacher must choose the topic to teach, plan how to present it so it makes sense, structure the lesson so that it is interesting, and prepare different explanations in case they are needed by struggling students. Only then can the lesson be given, during which the teacher must keep the attention of everyone in the class and prevent the students from interrupting and distracting each other.

Once the lesson is over, the work has still not ended, as the teacher must mark homework, provide feedback, and keep records to track each student's progress and what help they need. In fact, every hour of lessons requires a teacher to work for two or three hours in total.
