

Your Future Career

Career dreams are sometimes formed when children are young. They may want to imitate their parents and join the same profession. Some children want to become doctors to help people; others want to become teachers, painters, fashion designers, police officers, firefighters, or chefs. In school, children gather experience of the world and study many different subjects, gradually choosing their own career path.

But why do some people make their dreams come true, have successful careers, and make a bundle of money?

Successful people are those who make a specific goal and a plan to achieve it. Your plan may be to enrol in a degree or certificate course, burn the midnight oil, and find a stable nine-to-five job; alternatively, you might want to start your own business and forego an academic path. There are many successful start-ups, but many also fail. Yet despite the failure, they still started by thinking, planning, and executing that plan, hoping for good luck and success. How about you? How do you approach your career dream?
